Introduction

The terms (words, labels) used in the User Interface (UI) of a device, service or application may present an obstacle for their users if they are not familiar with those terms or if they are unsure as to their meaning. While some terms are introduced by manufacturers to denote a new class of features or to distinguish own features from those offered by competitors, most other terms denoting device or service features are not necessarily intended for differentiation. However, in the absence of a harmonized or recommended terminology, the use of those terms may differ considerably among manufacturers and service providers, thereby introducing ambiguity for end users.

The alternative to a confusing plethora of terms is some degree of harmonization among devices, services, and applications, at least for terms not intended to convey a certain brand feature or image. A harmonized terminology can be employed to help prevent the negative effects of an uncontrolled expansion of terms and the resulting ambiguity of the terms. Those negative effects include:

- increased user difficulties in understanding complex, ambiguous, and inconsistently-used terms, leading to unnecessary confusion;
- increased efforts in user education (user guides);
- increased costs for user support (hotline calls and call agent training);
- limited feature discovery and unclear user expectations (customers who do not understand certain features may not use them, hence some revenue may be missed);
- limited uptake (users may be reluctant to use a feature as they are not sure whether it has the expected effect);
- increase of cognitive complexity and subsequent learning effort; and
- abuse in the use of proprietary terms and lack of consistent use of terms.

The need for a harmonized terminology of device, service, and application features increases as new features and functionalities are being developed. Device software, services, and applications are frequently updated, often without even providing an update of the user documentation to the users.

ETSI EG 202 132 [i.1] claims that in order to aid users' learning procedures and to enable and simplify transfer and reuse of knowledge between devices, applications and services, it is relevant to support harmonized vocabularies for the most common and generic mobile ICT functions.

Consistency across basic interactive elements increases the ease and transfer of learning and improves the overall usability of complex mobile ICT environments. Such a transfer becomes even more important when older users or people with cognitive functional limitations are addressed and expected to use smartphones, mobile services and Internet applications in most segments of everyday life, such as: sending an email, transferring a call, or setting an alarm, etc.

A harmonized terminology can also be fed into terminology management systems used within a company to ensure the consistent use of terms across products and the internal and external documentation (e.g. design documents, user guides and promotional materials), see Clause 4.

ETSI EG 202 132 [i.1] contains harmonized English-language terms for a number of areas including user interfaces for hardware and software, configuration of messaging and data services, call features, and terminal functionality. ETSI TR 102 972 [i.2] extends the work done in ETSI EG 202 132 [i.1] towards 3G devices, mobile services, and applications. This extended list of proposed terms forms the initial basis for the terms considered. However, ETSI EG 202 132 [i.1] and ETSI TR 102 972 [i.2] were published a long time ago and require updating, inter alia to cover the many features and services evolved or not available at that time, and to cover other main European languages in addition to English.

The present document addresses this need on the basic level, covering 19 major official EU/EFTA languages (i.e. those spoken by more than 5 Million native speakers in Europe): Bulgarian, Croatian, Czech, Danish, Dutch, English, Finnish, French, German, Greek, Hungarian, Italian, Norwegian, Polish, Portuguese, Romanian, Slovak, Spanish, and Swedish. The remaining official languages of the EU and EFTA (i.e. those spoken by fewer than five Million native speakers - Estonian, Icelandic, Irish, Latvian, Lithuanian, Maltese, Raeto-Romance, and Slovenian) may be added in a later revision of the present document. In addition, given the speed of change in the mobile ICT landscape, it will naturally require updating to ensure continuing relevance. Furthermore, expansion to cover additional European languages and other languages used in Europe will further increase the usefulness and applicability of the present document.

The selection and validation process of the terms applied throughout their development, performed in collaboration with stakeholders is expected to add a quality dimension to the recommended vocabulary that would be difficult to achieve through an individual effort and is expected to contribute to the use and uptake of this freely available, public resource.

1 Scope

The present document aims at further simplifying end-user access to ICT devices, services, and applications by providing recommended terms for basic and commonly-used ICT-related objects and activities, notably those terms that end users are commonly exposed to. Recommended terms are provided in 19 languages: Bulgarian, Croatian, Czech, Danish, Dutch, English, Finnish, French, German, Greek, Hungarian, Italian, Norwegian, Polish, Portuguese, Romanian, Slovak, Spanish, and Swedish (as spoken in their respective European countries).

The recommended terms apply to mobile ICT devices and mobile applications (whether they are standalone or provide access to related services) commonly found in mobile ICT devices. Though developed in a mobile ICT context, most of the recommended terms are applicable to both mobile and fixed-network devices, services, and applications. The recommended terms are applicable to the User Interface (UI) design for a product as well as that of any user documentation accompanying it.

User requirements, industry-originated documents, and, when available, results of standardization work have been considered and integrated in the present document, providing implementation-oriented guidance. Wherever possible, a Design-for-All approach has been adopted, taking functional abilities of users, including elderly users and users with cognitive, physical, or sensory limitations into account.

The present document does not provide design guidance, nor does it intend to restrict the ability of market players to further improve and develop their devices and services. Neither does it intend to limit their options to trademark user interface elements or profile the user experience of brand-specific user interface implementations as a competitive edge.

4 User-centred development of terms

Intended users of the present document are those designing, developing, implementing, and deploying user interfaces for interaction with mobile ICT devices, services, and applications.

Intended end users mentioned in the present document are people who use mobile ICT devices, services, and applications ranging from first time users to experienced users.

Uniformity in the interactive elements increases the transfer of learning between different devices, services, and applications. Such knowledge transfer becomes even more important in a world of ubiquitous devices and services used by heterogeneous users. In particular, harmonized terms (used across devices, services, and applications from different manufacturers and providers) improve the overall usability of the entire ICT ecosystem. Use of the harmonized vocabulary in the present document for the development of ICT devices, services, and applications will enable end users to apply knowledge and experience, ensuring a user-friendly experience.

The present work goes beyond the automatic generation of bilingual terminologies, e.g. [i.11], addressing the automatic generation of bilingual terminologies, by applying a user-centred approach.

A consistent, harmonized, and accessible terminology will particularly benefit end users with temporary or permanent functional variations, such as those with literacy difficulties, or people with visual or cognitive impairments. A harmonized terminology should be easy to remember, recognize, and retrieve, and the individual terms should represent their related concepts well. A well-designed user terminology should have a shallow learning curve and cover most common tasks and use cases users are likely to encounter through the most common, every-day use patterns.

Finally, the terminology should also be useful for manufacturers' terminology management systems, a process to organize and associate terms with a clear set of rules for their usage (e.g. through a term base), also fostering its inclusion and, therefore, harmonization across user guides and user interfaces. Companies invest in terminology management in order to ensure that the terms used in internal documents, external documents such as user guides, in user interfaces, and for marketing information such as advertisements are used consistently.

Unmanaged and outdated terminology will easily become inconsistent, leading to time and resource-intensive documentation processes. It typically also reduces user satisfaction, limits cognitive accessibility and is often a main reason to the under-use of potentially beneficial functionality.

ETSI EG 202 417 [i.3] provides detailed guidelines on how terminology management can help improve the quality of user documentation. Applying these assists the user-centred generation of harmonised terminologies. Furthermore, prioritizing the user-centred view over "technical perfection" helps selecting terms the user will understand.

ISO 9999:2016 [i.12] and ISO/IEC TR 29138-1:2018 [i.13] are useful references and inspirational sources when developing mobile accessibility solutions and have been consulted, together with other functionality-area specific references (e.g. in the field of banking services or healthcare services, where terminology-related national regulations may exist and apply, and should be respected).

ISO/TC 37 [i.14] Terminology Principles and coordination (see https://www.iso.org/committee/48104.html) covers the standardization of descriptions, resources, technologies and services related to terminology, translation, and other language-based activities in the multilingual information society - without focusing on ICT in the mobile context of use.

Last but not least, consistently extending the focus of these efforts beyond the written word to include symbols, icons, pictograms and audiograms (often replacing text) will further benefit the user-centric product and service development.

5 Method

5.1 General

This clause describes the method applied for selecting the user-centred terminology presented in Clauses 6 and 7.

The selection of device-related terms (Clause 6) is inter alia based on the analysis of the documentation of the device manufacturers with the largest market shares in Europe. As the landscape of vendors for applications and services is much more diverse and fragmented across European regions, a different approach had to be selected for those functionality areas (Clause 7).

The method employed consists of three phases:

- Phase 1: Identification of objects and activities from a range of functional areas such as telephony or photography;
- Phase 2: Collection of terms used by major stakeholders (e.g. Apple™, Samsung™, Huawei™, and Xiaomi™ in the case of the device-related terms); and
- Phase 3: Analysis of terms collected and selection of recommended terms.

5.2 Phase 1: Identification of device-related and service- and applications-related objects and activities

This first phase identified functional areas (such as telephony, accessibility and social media) that define the range of functionalities covered by the present document.

Four functional areas cover functionalities frequently used by many users of mobile ICT devices. These device-related functional areas are:

1) General;
2) Accessibility;
3) Telephony; and
4) Photography.

Twelve functional areas cover functionalities frequently used by many users of mobile ICT services and applications. These service- and applications-related functional areas are:

1) General;
2) Messaging services;
3) Media services;
4) Societal services and communications;
5) Social media;
6) Banking and payment services;
7) eHealth services;
8) Travel services;
9) Navigation and maps;
10) Games;
11) Searching and browsing; and

12) Tools and miscellaneous.

For each functional area, relevant objects and activities (i.e. those that are frequently used and used by many users) were identified and defined, and the following principles were developed and applied.

Objects and activities were selected if they help users in:

- Identifying the functionality (i.e. help the user understand what it does);
- Accessing the functionality;
- Understanding the available options related to a functionality; and/or
- Understanding messages displayed in the context of using a functionality (e.g. error feedback).

Objects and activities were typically not selected (unless required by the context) if they cover:

- The most common content of an application (e.g. "Photo", "Take the first exit at the roundabout"), or the style of the interaction;
- Common terms easily found in a dictionary (e.g. "hotel");
- The most common verbal expressions indicating an action taken on an object (e.g. "take a photo"); and/or
- Words, acronyms, or abbreviations used in a specific technical sense (e.g. "CCNR").

Objects and activities relevant for multiple functional areas are treated as general terms in both categories (see Clauses 6.2 and 7.2 respectively).

5.3 Phase 2: Collection of terms

For each device-related functional area (Generic, Accessibility, Telephony and Photography), relevant device vendors were identified and the terms used by them for the objects and activities of the respective functional area were collected in the nineteen languages covered by the present document. For the analysis, the top smartphone manufacturers in Europe were selected based on their market share at the time of writing.

In most cases, the number of manufacturers had to be limited in order to keep the effort for the analysis manageable. The analysis showed that not all functionalities were necessarily offered by all manufacturers. Functionalities offered by a sole manufacturer were not included in the analysis, unless there were strong reasons requiring that (e.g. innovative and important, upcoming functionality or a considerable or dominant market share).

The approach described above for the device-related functionalities could not be applied to the applications and service-related functionalities, as the latter are not based in the device itself and are consequently more dynamic, less consistent, and more differentiated. Instead, a use-case-based approach was employed with the aim of capturing the most-frequently-used terms employed by key stakeholders.

5.4 Phase 3: Analysis and selection

In the final phase of the work, the terms collected in Phase 2 were reviewed and the terms to be recommended were selected based on:

- A check for semantics and syntax in relation to the functionality provided;
- An evaluation with regard to understandability, clarity, and jargon-freeness;
- A check for consistency between vendors (i.e. prevalence of certain terms);
- Final selection, reviews, and prioritization with stakeholders (electronically and through workshops and reviews).

5.5 Principles of use

For the present document, the following principles of use in implementations apply:

- Service and interaction design guidelines are not provided - with one exception: a firm recommendation for redundant support of multiple terms used under stress (e.g. in emergency situations);
- In some instances, more than one term is recommended (separated by semicolons), presented in an order of anticipated preference;
- Interchangeable elements within a phrase are separated with a slash (e.g. for "interruptor de timbre/silencio" both "interruptor de timbre" and "interruptor de silencio" are acceptable);
- Elements in brackets are optional (e.g. for "(Rufton-) Lautstärke" both "Lautstärke" and "Rufton-Lautstärke" are acceptable);
- Brand names and brand-specific, or brand-associated, commercial terms have been avoided to the largest extent possible;
- In certain cases, the support of multiple, redundant choices is recommended (even beyond emergency services mentioned above);
- While individual users are of diverse gender, only grammatically masculine terms related to humans are presented in the tables in Clauses 6 and 7 (e.g. only "Benutzer" and not "Benutzerinnen und Benutzer"; only "interlocuteur" and not also "interlocutrice"). This is done in order to keep the tables easy to read. Implementors will have to apply the appropriate form(s) for a given application of the terminology;
- Similarly, while applications address the user either using formal or informal pronouns (e.g. "Deine Favoriten" vs. "Ihre Favoriten", or "Tes lieux" vs. "Vos lieux"), only one form is provided in the tables in Clauses 6 and 7;
- Last but not least, the choice of the grammatical form (e.g. of the verbs) may be influenced by the specifics of the language in question and therewith not entirely consistent. However, this will always be adapted to the specific deployment and the context of use.

6 Device-related terminologies

6.1 Domain categories

The recommended device-related terms listed in the present clause are divided into the following domains or categories:

- General (Clause 6.2);
- Accessibility (Clause 6.3);
- Telephony (Clause 6.4); and
- Photography (Clause 6.5).

NOTE: The terminologies contained in the present document are accessible in machine-readable format under https://labs.etsi.org/rep/HF/eg203499/-/tree/v2.1.2.

6.2 General terms

6.2.1 Overview

General terms are fundamental terms related to the mobile device itself, its accessories, or its basic functionality. They are typically exposed to the end-user in user manuals, the UI, and in some cases, in commercial material. General terms related to basic functionality are used frequently across a wide range of applications, but they have similar effects, irrespective of the context in which they are employed.

General terms are classified in the following seven sub-categories:

- Hardware and physical elements (Clause 6.2.2);
- Other physical items (Clause 6.2.3);
- Software (Clause 6.2.4);
- Control functions - softkeys (Clause 6.2.5);
- Control functions - gestures (Clause 6.2.6);
- Basic functions (Clause 6.2.7); and
- Radio related (Clause 6.2.8).

6.2.2 General terms: Hardware and physical elements

These terms describe physical elements of the mobile device, corresponding to what in technical terms is defined as "Hardware".

The meaning of each term is explained in Tables 1a to 1e, provided together with the language-specific versions of the terms in the 19 languages.

6.2.8 General terms: Radio related

Although the end-user is normally not aware of the technical complexity of a mobile phone, there are a few radio-related terms the user is exposed to. These terms typically define technical radio features and are perceived as such by the end-user. They are described in user manuals and in some cases - but not all - are used or activated with user participation. In other cases, they are exposed to the end user to allow understanding of radio considerations such as good/bad coverage or high/low data rate.

The meaning of each term is explained in Tables 7a to 7e, provided together with the language-specific versions of the terms in the 19 languages.

6.3 Accessibility terms

6.3.1 Overview

Accessibility terms provide access to the necessary settings, device adjustments, specific functionality, and connectivity to adapt the device UI to the functional variations and requirements of end users. This clause is additionally supporting inclusive design and the implementation of support for ETSI EN 301 549 [i.7] in mobile ICT products, services and applications. Guidance on supported and available accessibility features is available from the Mobile and Wireless Forum through GARI, see [i.10].

ISO 9999:2016 [i.12] and ISO/IEC TR 29138-1:2018 [i.13] have been consulted. A working group, ISO/TC 37 [i.14] Terminology Principles and coordination (see https://www.iso.org/committee/48104.html) covers the standardization of descriptions, resources, technologies and services related to terminology, translation, and other activities in the multilingual information society and may provide useful insights, even if not specifically focusing on the mobile context of use.

A practical difficulty often encountered is the OS- or platform-specific (and often not fully comparable) use of features and terminology applied to the accessibility terms of devices. For the purpose of the present document, these are classified into the following six sub-categories covered through the next clauses:

- Access and settings (Clause 6.3.2);
- Vision (Clause 6.3.3);
- Hearing (Clause 6.3.4);
- Dexterity (Clause 6.3.5);
- Cognitive assistance (Clause 6.3.6); and
- Media retrieval (Clause 6.3.7).

6.3.2 Accessibility terms: Access and settings

Accessibility settings provide access to device adjustments and connectivity settings, adapting the device UI to the functional variations of end users.

The meaning of each term is explained in Tables 8a to 8e, provided together with the language-specific versions of the terms in the 19 languages.

6.4 Telephony services

6.4.1 Overview

Previous work, such as that referenced in [i.1] and [i.2] is taken into account and a user focus is applied through the reduction of technical complexity by merging categories of features and functionality in cases where distinguishing these makes little sense and is mostly not understood by end users. This clause focuses on the mobile context.

Telephony service-related terms are classified in the following four sub-categories:

- Device UI (Clause 6.4.2);
- Device functionality (Clause 6.4.3);
- Voice call handling (Clause 6.4.4); and
- System and network services (Clause 6.4.5).

7.2.1 Overview

General terms are generic, common terms related to mobile ICT services and applications. They are typically exposed to the end-user in user manuals, the UIs for setup and use, and in marketing material (e.g. as service availability information). General terms related to basic functionality are frequently used across a wide range of services and applications, but they provide similar, common functionality, irrespective of the context in which they are employed.

General terms are classified in the following three sub-categories:

- Authentication, login and confirmation (Clause 7.2.2);
- Setup and settings (Clause 7.2.3); and
- Common functionality (Clause 7.2.4).

7.2.2 General terms: Authentication, login and confirmation

This clause covers a sub-category of general terms related to mobile ICT services and applications: authentication, login and confirmation.

The meaning of each term is explained in Tables 21a to 21e, provided together with the language-specific versions of the terms in the 19 languages.
